The core theme running through these tales is the unavoidability of the unexpected. Life, Buzzati hints, is brimming of puzzles, moments of wonder and fear that invade upon the habitual. This is not presented as a melancholy viewpoint, but rather as a acknowledgment of the fundamental uncertainty of existence. The store itself, a representation for life's unpredictable nature, offers a array of unusual goods, each with its own bizarre result.

One such story, "The Mouse," is a particularly powerful example. Another memorable story, "The Fall," presents a different perspective. Here, the tale centers around a man's fixated worry with a enigmatic incident. His unsuccessful attempt to comprehend this mystery underscores the limitations of human comprehension in the face of the uncertain. This tale effectively shows the power of imagination and its ability to both produce and destroy.

Buzzati's writing style is unique, characterized by a mixture of exact detail and subtle implication. He avoids explicit explanations, allowing the reader to understand the meaning of each story on a private level. This technique adds to the overall ambiance of mystery, enhancing the influence of the stories' unusual themes.
